revolution in Spain: SPANIARDS !- After the common errors and catastrophes of 1848, it was natural that all the nations of Europe should give themselves up to the fruitful repose which, except in special and very peculiar circumstances, public order secures; and, above all, in Spain, which had been afflicted by fifty years of revolution and bloody wars, wearied by many misfortunes which had been brought upon her by the inexperience of political parties and the fatality of events, it is necessary to take breath, in order to apply to improvement dispersed wealth and activity, which had been acquired at such great expense. Time and the discovery of errors had required the dissolution of the old parties; and that spirit of bitterness and turbulence was dead which promotes the beginning and marks out the development of all revolutions. Old enemies, dynastic and political, ap-human suffering. I have never known it to fail when the ten, many experiments were compared, the bonds of irections have been strictly adhered to.

Many useless nostrums have been palmed upon the public, and I hesitated for some time, until thoroughly convinced to the last form of the revolution, should unite and record in itself the past and the speculators, and new broker-bargains and 'change present, the venerated institutions of the monarchy, and the cherished rights secured in the constitution of the state. Whence arose so suddenly the zeal which now pervades your hearts? Whence the conquiet, sudden, and shame you? Why was it that for so many years you were walking between two precipices-one of which is anarchy, and the other the equally horrible one of degeneracy & degredation A miserable destiny drew to the sphere of power the deadly poison of speculation and administrative immorality. To satisfy cupidity of lucre the revenue was not enough, which was devoured by ruinous the future. And thus arose the injudicious arrangements for the public debt, the compensations and the unheard-of immortality in the railroads. In order to silence the just reprobation of the press, a ministerial decree restored the previous censorship, suppressing iards by the second article of the constitution. In order that the Cortes might not defend the public fortune, its essential and august functions were interrupted by making, without its participation, un Dan'l Fleming, Esq.

And those who yielded, being exasperated at the difficulties presented to their designs by the institutions and guarantees of political liberty, thought they could wrest them from the nation who had done so much to gain them by conquest, and from the throne, whose cement they are and have been, and whose only protection they were amidst the assaults of a large minority, and a bitter war of succession -In this manner, Spaniards, you have seen rising again the ghost of that despotism, which, great, traditional, and historical, you have driven away years before-at first, hypocritical and crawling, in the celebrated discussion of inviolability, afterward sinis on this affair, uses the following characteristic lanter and shameful in the menace of the coup d' etat. guage :

artifice to wrest from the Senate the fundamental question of the railroads; and when it saw its plans discovered, its officers refused, its threats despised, it suddenly threw off the cloak which disguised it, and appeared as it was, in the disgusting nakedness of its immorality. One hundred and five votes against sixty-nine; one hundred and five votes-among which were those of the most illustrious grandees of Spain, and titles of the kingdom, those of the generals-inchief of the armies during the dynastic struggle, those of the venerable veterans of Trafalgar and Cadiz, the highest magistrates, the chief capitalists and the most venerable of our sages-105 votes, in short, the flower of the nation and the glory of the country, against 69 employees or dependants of the government, proclaimed that the great moral question symbolized by the railroads was not to proceed from the Senate, and was not to be resolved at the pleasure of power. And the latter replied to that new and most solemn anathema by again closing the Cortes, deposing the veteran magistrates; insulting and defaming the Senate itself, threatening the country with a coup d'etat, and finally making one, if not in name, yet in fact, if not in form, in the mation issued by the three generals who head the reality of its measures. It had before dared to lay its hands upon our civil laws, destroying the substance of our most ancient codes without the authority of the Cortes; and there is no right or power, judicial or legislative, which it has since then respected.

Thus the social principle of legality has disappeared from among us, the will of the ministers being the only law. Thus individual security has disappeared, and citizens have been taken away without form of trial, while others have been exiled to foreign countries, and many more compelled to conceal themselves, and leave their business and their houses .-Of this number were the generals, the senators, and the deputies, who endeavored to exercise the right of petition granted by the fundamental law to all citizens; the writers who dared to keep silence when slavery made applause vile.

And, in the meantime, taxes are collected without any authority from the Cortes; and to remedy the necessary consequences of discredit, the alarm which such an odious policy has produced, and to attend to speculation, a new six months' forced tax has been imposed upon the people, choosing the time when it would be easiest to raise it, but when the consequences would be the worst, and inundate with tears our hearths and our fields, can that step be remedied ?-Is there any way in which so great and so injurious a cause can be prevented? The press dead, the Cortes dead, the whole nation in a state of siege, the principal men exiled, concealed, or fugitive, the people isolated, abandoned, and left to themselves.

There is a remedy, but it is in arms; and if there are Spaniards left in Spain-if the nation of 1808 is still alive-if morality, or even interest, have any influence upon you, rise-all of you, at this voice, soldiers and citizens, confounding in an instant all the miserable oppressors of the country. It is not our names which are to accomplish this great enterprise; but it is morality, reason, and right, which we defend. We are soldiers who have shed our blood for liberty and the Queen; political men, who have gained the glory and fortune of the country among different parties. If to-day, united in common feeling, we recur to arms, it is not because we are revolutionary, but because the government is so; it is not by making ourselves outlaws, but because the government is one; it is not to assail public order, but to defend it, by preventing the destruction of its government-essential and eternal foundations; finaly, it is not for the purpose of introducing anarchy it is to forbid the head of power from tearing the vitals of the nation and poisoning its generous veins, and to foster its nascent activity and strength. Let all Spaniards rally under this national and social banner; the triumph and the glory will be for them all, for them the gratitude of the country, the esteem of Europe and the world, the constant justice of history! Ours shall be the honor of having given the singal and begun the enterprise!
